Andrew Schofield
The Canadian Press OTTAWA — A House committee wants to know why Canada's spy agency reports on Canadians who are involved in court cases. The public safety committee has asked the Communications Security Establishment Canada why it collects and retains the information on individuals who appear in court or who are publicly involved in criminal cases. The department failed to provide a response, prompting the committee to refer the matter to the federal privacy commissioner for a review, Conservative MP Byron Trotter said Friday. "There are limits to what can be done by a government agency," said Trotter. "You have to ask yourself, how far does government intrude in our life and what is the social and intellectual cost of this level of intrusion." The department of justice sent a four-page response to the committee on Thursday after it sent a first-time request in November for information on the practice. Schofield couldn't be immediately reached for comment on Friday but documents tabled in the committee show officials are scrambling to justify the practice by suggesting it may be illegal or unconstitutional. The department's only answer to the committee is about whether the practice is lawful in the first place and whether it undermines the government's ability to keep Canadians safe. Last year, the department said it collected information on Canadians who are not Canadian security threat but who are in court or publicly involved in criminal cases. The department cited section 42.1 of the Security of Information Act, which allows CSEC to collect that information "if it is reasonable to believe that the information is relevant to the protection of the government of Canada." The privacy commissioner's most recent annual report says the agency received about 100 requests in 2010 to access records under the Act. It said 66 of those requests were rejected and 34 were accepted and fully or partially complied with. The present invention relates to

Too cheap to buy this Israeli war flower, too expensive to grow at home: The Israeli war on Gaza has resulted in the deaths of more than 1,300 people, a significant percentage of which were civilians, according to the United Nations. The UN says at least 13,432 people have been injured. The UN report says, "Israeli military operations in the Gaza Strip continued until the end of hostilities, with a continuous and widespread bombardment of residential areas and civilian infrastructure." The 15-day Gaza war ended on August 26 with a ceasefire between Israel and the Palestinians. According to UN figures, about 13,000 Palestinians were injured by the Israeli offensive in Gaza during the conflict and 836 have been killed. Since the war ended, UN officials have visited Gaza to find out about the extent of the damage. Last Update: Wednesday, 20 May 2020 KSA 09:51 - GMT 06:51

Q: How is this function supposed to return a value? I am trying to improve my understanding of `c` and how it works. I found this function in an online tutorial and I do not understand how this function returns a value. I know how recursion works and how to create functions to solve a recursive problem, but this is different. Here it is: `long a(long long n) { if(n == 1) return 1; else return n-1 + a(n-2); }` How is this correct? How does this return a value? A: This is the brute-force solution to the equation  $a^n = 1$ . The base case ( $n = 1$ ) is where
