The present invention relates to nuclear reactors and in particular to steam generator tubes. In a typical pressurized water nuclear power generation plant, the reactor core is formed of fuel assemblies disposed in groups in a water-filled reactor vessel. A coolant water spray is blown vertically downwardly through the vessel and across the fuel assemblies in the core. The coolant water is channeled through a closed system of channels, tubes and nozzles in the vessel and through a gallery over the fuel assemblies. The coolant water flows from the gallery through a plurality of tubes (i.e., tubesheet tubes) extending through the fuel assemblies which receive the coolant water and dissipate its heat. The coolant water then returns to the core via an external downcomer. Cooling efficiency of the reactor core is a significant factor in determining power output of the plant and thus the cost of operating the plant. The primary coolant water sprayed through the core acts as a blanket surrounding the core, slowing the rate at which the fuel assemblies emit energy. The coolant water, however, is itself heated by its flow through the core, resulting in a loss of substantial amounts of heat from the system. The volume of coolant water required for the system and the size and number of nozzles or orifices in the vessel through which the water flows are not insignificant, particularly in light of the fact that the fissionable fuel in the fuel assemblies contributes heat to the coolant water. The coolant water in the reactor vessel cools the reactor and vessel walls and supports the vessel. Reactor coolant water can be as high as 400°C F. The pressure to the coolant water in the core is higher than at the inlet (supercritical), due to the resistive heating of the core by the primary coolant water and recirculation, and is controlled at a level of 50 p.s.i. or more. The coolant flow rate is about 25 gallons/minute per foot of fuel assembly height. In contrast, the coolant flow rate through the tubes in the tubesheet is high, typically from 120-160 gallons/minute per foot. The coolant flows through tubesheet tubes, which typically have a higher flow resistance than the fuel assembly tubes. As a result, a higher pressure is needed to maintain a desired coolant water flow rate through the tube. The primary cooling problem is the inability of the reactor to remove heat from the steam generator tubes. The heat load of the
