Creator Jon Acuff was an avid gamer as a kid, and by the time he was 12 he had a working NES. From there he became immersed in the world of video games, earning his A-level and B-level certifications. However, despite being a proficient game player, he was still a kid at heart, and found himself drawn towards music. He purchased his first guitar, an Ibanez, in high school. He then followed it up with lessons, and was playing gigs at bars and coffee shops by the time he was 19. His career started to take off when Jon heard of a little company in the Chicago suburbs that released and marketed video games, called Spectrum HoloByte. After all, who didn't want to have a game character with their name on it? And who could forget the glorious Sega days? So Jon dropped out of college and went to work for Spectrum. He played games all day and thought about music at night. Soon after his boss recommended Jon take lessons. It seemed the best idea he had heard yet. As he was about to start lessons, he found a home at a place called Keyboard Matrix, a guitar store and music shop on the Southwest side of Chicago. Over the next five years, Jon went from selling his first song to being signed by a label. He moved from acoustic to electric, then back to acoustic again. He learned to cover songs from such artists as Peter Gabriel and U2, going on tours to places like England, Japan, Australia, and Canada. Then after taking a break from music, he just picked it back up. With a few songs under his belt, he finally released his debut, "Crack the Sky," in 2014. About two years later, he released his sophomore effort, "Well Vibrate," which is arguably his most successful and widely known song to date. His latest album, "Higher Learning," dropped in August 2016, just months before he was diagnosed with type 1 diabetes. He had always considered it a weight off his shoulders to no longer have to self-medicate. When he started playing again, he found himself playing for the first time in years, and getting back to the lighter side of music. His last album, "Listen Up," is actually his fifth album, but the first since 2013. It is

A pokitierre (or) is a type of card game that originated in Lisbon, Portugal in the 19th century. It was developed as a takeoff on both an earlier game called hi-hi and American trick-taking games such as Euchre and Skat. Two or three players take the role of a team of little people who move around a board that represents their private rooms while a host of human players (called "ringers") try to set traps and bust the team. Pokitier The game is played with three to five hands, each with their own points, viz. P1, P2, P3, P4, and P5. Each hand consists of thirteen ranks, each represented by a single letter of the alphabet (A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, and M), in alphabetic order. For each A, B, C, D, or E rank, one player picks up a token and passes the rest of the hand to the player on his or her right, and to the player on his or her left in the case of four/five-hand play. An additional token is used as the banker's stake. There is a natural division between the hands into the two ranges: upper and lower. Uppercuts are two-or-fewer. Moves (indicated by arrows on the board; the arrows go up to four players and straight out the door to a player who is designated as the initial banker) proceed clockwise. The dealer takes the turn with the dice and announces a number if his or her choice is a range, a number in a range, or an upper or a lower slash. If he or she has the option to double down, the players taking a turn will go out in that order, and the dealer will count off three throws in order to make sure that nobody else does double down. After three throws (two if nothing has been double-downed), the player rolls the dice again and gets a count if his or her card moves. For consecutive moves by each player, the player rolls one of the two dice normally and any card that is rolled with it counts and moves. If the first die's or the second die's total equals the player's card or number, then the player's card and number move - the player is out, unless the card used equals one
