Surgical pathology of gallbladder mucosa in humans. A total of 65 common bile ducts (CBDs) resected during choledochoscopy were examined for the presence of biliary dysplasia. The CBDs were examined at seven (1.3%), nine (1.5%), 17 (25.8%), 21 (31.8%), 37 (55.5%), 48 (73.8%), and 89 (56.1%) months postoperatively. Histologic evidence of dysplasia of biliary epithelium was observed in 16 cases (24.6%), including eight of seven cases with only one biopsy and eight of 48 cases with only two biopsies. Eleven cases had a squamous epithelium from a single biopsy. In four other cases, a low-grade dysplasia was observed in either one or two biopsies. In the remaining 10 cases, a low-grade dysplasia was observed in two or more biopsies. These dysplasias could possibly have represented de novo carcinogenesis. There was a significant correlation between the number of biopsy specimens and the likelihood of detection of dysplasia ( $P = 0.019$ ). The feasibility of the sequential surveillance and the periodicity (i.e., 7, 17, and 51 months) of sampling of biliary epithelium during follow-up of resected CBDs, possibly involving surveillance by endoscopic retrograde cholangiopancreatography or intraoperative cholangioscopy, are discussed.
