"I believe," said Ludovicus,
"that I have your cooperation, and I beg you to be patient with this young man, whom I have already experienced the kindness of. I will now show him to you." "If you please, baron," said the stranger, "I am a stranger here; I am in quest of my wife, Margaret, the sister of the baroness of the castle. I did not expect to find her here; I had understood that she had gone out with her husband, the baron; but I have also heard that they were not of such good friends as I was led to believe. Neither the baron nor his wife ever takes any credit to themselves for other people's good deeds, and I believe that they are not in the habit of going out unless they can go together. If the young lady has returned home, I will not seek the baroness, and if not I shall wait for them here, for I have had bad news from my father, to whom I am bound by ties of blood. "I beg you, baron, to give me my answer as soon as you can, for I have found her and she is in good health." "I pray you to be seated, sir," said the baron. "Hast thou, then, good news of Margaret? Where is the young lady, and where is the baron?" "I have just seen her, and I have also seen the baron," said the young man. "He was not with you at dinner, and you did not send him out to dine with his wife." "In truth, the young lady has such perfect control over herself that she does not even seem to enjoy the honour that her husband does her." "But the baron, who is wise, is also deceived." "I must be so, sir, for that cannot be. Be so good as to tell me all you know about them. I heard that the baroness was a lady of very high birth, but I did not know her father or her brother; I do not even know
