[Hepatoblastoma associated with mongolian spot]. A rare case of hepatoblastoma associated with mongolian spot has been reported. A 4 year and 6 months old boy had been noted small nodule at his hepatic dome. Four years after the first examination, he died of liver tumor. An autopsy revealed large nodule with cystic changes on hepatic lobe. Histologically, it showed undifferentiated small to moderate sized blast cells. Among them some areas were composed of embryonic type hepatoblastoma, and others were made of large round nuclei hepatoma. The features of embryonal hepatoblastoma included abnormal mitosis, small to moderate sized blast cells with various size nuclei, occasional mucin secreting bile ductular cells, squamous cell carcinoma-like change and hepatoid change.

The electrocortical startle modulation: an electrophysiological approach to social-emotional modulation of the eyeblink startle reflex. In four independent startle and pupillometry experiments the continuous light phase of the experiment, in which the light is present, was investigated. Further, in two startle experiments, during the post-startle investigation periods, the correlation between the eyeblink-pupil and startle reflex was studied. The results showed the startle modulation: the eyeblink-pupil blink-index was less negative than in the passive control trials, but in the light trials the amplitude of the eyeblink-pupil blink-index increased. We conclude that the mechanism behind this startle modulation is very different from the startle habituation. Further, we interpret
