What's new in Ground Zero Texas - Nuclear Edition:

: A sex worker at Red Light Changes “In the John and Mary Way, we’re sort of thought leaders; you know, we’re given the cred to speak on issues of sex workers’ rights.” The desk I’m sitting at today is covered with books. Right now it’s overflowing: magazines, coffee-table books, a couple heavy academic books, and works of fiction: “Sex and the City,” for example, and, of course, the Alexander and I series of stories. They’re full of family, of better, more reliable families than the ones I grew up with. The ones that are more stable and middle-class. The ones that are rich. The ones I wouldn’t dare tell my parents or my family, even if I had the chance. Even if I could get away with it. Even if I just needed to be able to talk to someone who has traveled the same road I have walked. The road of selling sex. I’m sitting here looking at the books and the media that has bombarded me these last few years. I’m thinking about the magnetism of the Reed and the John and Mary Way. I mean, authors like Xeni Jardin, president of the Online News Association, has sent me hundreds and hundreds of e-mails. Another writer and sex worker, Molly Crabapple, has sent me a message and said that Reed has blown her mind and changed the way that she has thought about female sexuality. Using a story about her own pregnancy and beginning of motherhood, she explained how Reed’s stories have set her free. It’s amazing. I’ve never felt so covered. I’m scared of what the world is like outside these well-trafficked, well-fortified walls of Reed. Even now, with all that’s happened, somehow I don’t think about the possible backlash. My parents think I’m headed for a career in the medical field. Why would they think something like that when they’ve never known my work, my sex work? I’ve worked with a few doctors and talked with a couple of them about the John and Mary Way. I’ve also talked with a few young women, specifically college age, about publishing their books and movies. They’re very interested. They’

How to set up default values for PostgreSQL queries What are defaults? In PostgreSQL, when a query is performed without specifying an option, a set of default values is used. By default, the query result is the most recent result from the table. These values are specified in the database's administration interface. In the following example, we see that the results are empty. The example shown below is for the table members. Default results shown in the database administration interface Default values are not a necessarily good way of writing a query. You can often achieve the same result by using the EXISTS operator; therefore, the majority of PostgreSQL developers advise against using defaults. The defaults system in PostgreSQL does not work like the one in Oracle; the default value is not a fallback if the table is empty. Instead, the result you get is not always the most recent entry. At most, it is the most recent entry for every table's sequence that is set to the AUTOINCREMENT attribute. In addition, if the attribute is a FOREIGN KEY, then the default value will always be the foreign key target's primary key. Setting defaults for SELECT queries in a query editor window If you use an editor window (such as an SQL Query Builder or an EditorWindow) to perform a SELECT query, you can use the Query Properties dialog to set the defaults for
