While many instructors are happy to provide the instruction, time constraints due to their lack of experience with “on-line” instruction make it difficult for the instructors to keep up to date, particularly when new content is added to the software program. Such content may include, for example, updated textbook content, updated course content such as readings and other important material, and other material that is regularly provided by the instructor in order to keep the student’s academic interest and progress. It is a challenge for the instructors to keep up to date with new content, particularly when the instructor does not have access to the content with which the student is working or otherwise is expected to interact. While the instructor may periodically download new content to the course, this time consuming process is difficult to manage when the course is not static and is expected to dynamically change, such as where the student is taking a term or sequence of courses. Previous attempts to solve this problem have met with little success. For example, some systems have provided “blackboard” style “on-line” courses, where the instructor can set up a “blackboard” and distribute content through this separate system, but this is a cumbersome process, especially when using a large number of instructors. The instructor must set up a separate “blackboard” for each course, and can only limit its use to students who are also members of the institution's campus or system. Further, each instructor must use a proprietary software application to upload and distribute content, and can do so only in a limited and inconvenient manner. The systems that do utilize blackboards have the additional problem that they only provide a limited range of functionality, and that the instructor must take great time to define the system to properly operate. Generally, the instructor must determine a static network address for the “blackboard”, must associate the network address with the instructor's computer or device, and then install and configure an application on each of the devices that will provide the instructor with access to the “blackboard”. Ulnar nerve entrapment in inverter tenosynovitis:
