qlikview is a flexible tool that can help business analysts answer any question quickly and efficiently. you can easily format or analyze data in any way. it can help you analyze data and develop your own models. unlike traditional business intelligence, qlikview is not restricted to a single database.

qlikview is designed to use in-memory data, which stores the data in its native file format. unlike traditional business intelligence tools, you can do most of the analysis in qlikview. you can access data from any operating system or database, and you can create new databases and data models that can be used with any operating system. to me, the question about the source code is the first question that comes to my mind when i look at the qlikview implementation. i have come across a couple of cases where there were issues with caching. these issues are caused when you use the same cache file for different requests. if you haven't done it before, you should understand that the cache file is a local file that is used for optimizing the performance. it is a very important file to be careful with. if you don't know what it is about, i can explain in more detail in a few of my upcoming articles. the only thing i could think of in terms of performance issues is using a lot of data sources or trying to process a massive amount of data at one time. and no, you can't handle it with a local file. it is not a local file in a sense that it can be cached. it is a file that is stored in a location on your hard drive or in the cloud. therefore, i would recommend that you read about the file cache mechanism in qlikview to understand what it is, what it can and can't do.
