In recent years, semiconductor technologies have been developed to realize high integration and high speed of integrated circuits. In particular, the speedup of an electro-optical device including a light-emitting element has been accelerated by this technology. The potential development of various device applications using electro-optical devices is now expected. An organic EL device that is an example of electro-optical devices includes an electrode layer made of an electrically conductive material and a light-emitting layer sandwiched between the electrode layers. The light-emitting layer includes a light-emitting material, and when the light-emitting layer emits light, the light is extracted through the electrode layers. In recent years, especially, organic EL devices have been actively studied because of their high-speed responses to input signals (high-speed response) and large-area luminescence. In order to achieve high-speed response and large-area luminescence, a low-molecular organic material is not a suitable material that can be used for an organic EL device. On the other hand, among high-molecular organic materials that exhibit high luminescence efficiency, in particular, high-molecular organic materials with an anisotropic charge transport property (charge carrier mobility) are suitable for achieving high-speed response and large-area luminescence. When a charge-transporting compound (an electron-transporting material and a hole-transporting material) is used as a charge transport material in an organic EL device, a light-emitting layer may be made of an anisotropic charge-transporting compound (an electron-transporting material and a hole-transporting material) in order to efficiently drive a light-emitting element. However, when the light-emitting layer is made of an anisotropic charge-transporting compound, it has not yet been successful to show enough driving properties. In order to achieve high-speed response and large-area luminescence, the weight ratio of the organic material having the anisotropic charge transport property in the light-emitting layer should be increased. In particular, when the anisotropy is high, the driving voltage should be increased in order to obtain a constant current at a constant voltage. Therefore, when such an anisotropic charge-transporting compound is used as
