HexHub is a Web-based file sharing platform which allows you to set up and manage public file servers. The server will host public files, so people can see them, download them, and link to them. You can setup web links to link to the files in the web browser, and can also use Google Reader to subscribe to feeds which contain these files. You can set up a service in a very simple way, with just a few clicks. You can run a free or a paid server, and have users' data be encrypted using a strong password. You can limit the user's access to the files to prevent abuse. You can get your own domain with your own URL, or set up your own server which allows you to use a custom URL. If you use your own server, you can use a custom icon, just upload your icon to the server. You can use virtual hosts to make the site look the way you want. Using the API, you can get all information about users, including their public files. You can also get all users' files, or get lists of users with certain properties, such as domain name, URL, IP address, etc. You can also add notifications, and e-mail addresses to your users. If you use the internal API, you can get the results of file searches, and use them to write some search plugins. You can manage your servers on your own, or you can use the software's own Web interface. You can configure users' permissions to the files, and assign their own domains. You can also control who can access the files, and decide which users can send files. Some limitations and problems: For a free version, HexHub doesn't provide all the features a paid version has. It also doesn't have all the tools that you can use on a paid version. If the applications doesn't work properly, you can send a support request. Not all features are supported in the free version.
