For instance, I haven't decided of how I want to use it yet. I could always configure it to function in a way that will be super portable for myself. This iPad Pro will not work, and possibly never work, as a traditional image editor. Edit the images, crop, adjust, and all of those things. It is not exactly what I want, but it is probably more portable than a MacBook. Doing simple edits is more important than being able to edit. This is simply because 99% of the edits I do are simple ones. Sometimes it not hard to find software reviews written by software manufacturers. Though hype aside, they're a useful resource and help you decide whether or not you need the software, and also help you identify important features.
