These approaches are based on spectral, energy and machine learning features. The principle of automatic detection of submarines through spectral features is based on analyzing the power spectrum of the received signal, in terms of time and frequency. This spectrum is compared to a reference spectrum. Detection is performed through comparison of differences, from which a probability of detection (PD) and probability of false alarm (PF) are calculated. In this case, it is assumed that each frequency band is analyzed independently and that the submarine is not moving. This method is valid for a wide range of submarines, if the analyzed spectrum is the one of the reference, without modification. This method is used when the submarine detected is transmitting. In the second approach, energy features are used, as it is done for the first approach. This method includes a pre-processing phase, where the signal is processed and filtered to extract the energy of the signal in each frequency band. The energy features are compared to a reference, by calculating the Euclidean distance. This method is valid for a wide range of submarines, if the analyzed frequency band is the one of the reference. This method is used when the submarine detected is transmitting. The third approach is based on machine learning, using the process of the input data to the network. In this case, the surface of the submarine is modeled as a Gaussian, which is transmitted to the network. The convolutional network is used to analyze the data obtained from the Gaussian. The output of this network is a probability of classification of the detected submarine. This method is valid for a wide range of submarines, if the received signal has similar characteristics to the reference. This method is used when the submarine detected is transmitting. The methods have been compared using synthetic data and real data collected from the experiment in 2016, which is the first in the world. The results obtained show that the detection of the studied submarine is more reliable using the machine learning approach, where the detection of the submarine was possible even if the submarine was transmitting.
