While there is a lack of evidence for an association between childhood adversity and autism, those who have been exposed to early adversity have been shown to have altered responses to sensory stimuli compared to those with no early adversity. These responses can include hyperarousal, heightened response to startle, and exaggerated startle reflexes. It is unknown whether exaggerated responses are specific to a given modality of sensory stimulation, such as visual or auditory stimulation, or whether responses are exacerbated by multiple types of sensory stimuli. We plan to conduct a study to examine responses to multiple types of sensory stimuli in children who have experienced an early life stressor, and in children who have not experienced early life stress. One of the aims of this study will be to examine whether the exaggerated startle response (ERS) is an attentional phenomenon (sensory) or a maturational response (non-sensory). We will recruit 36 children, half exposed to childhood maltreatment and half with no history of early life stress. Half of each group will be girls and half will be boys. We will test three groups of children: maltreated/visually cued, maltreated/auditory cued, and non-maltreated. In order to assess the degree to which the ERS is due to attention, the stimuli will be both visual and auditory in nature. In order to assess the degree to which the ERS is due to maturation, the cues will be presented under both laboratory (in the presence of the researcher) and naturalistic (in the presence of the child's parents) conditions. The general aim of this study is to provide preliminary data on the degree to which the ERS can be generalized to other sensory modalities. This is particularly important given the evidence for cross-sensory processing in the general population. The present invention relates to a semiconductor memory device and a method for testing 04aeff104c
