There are a ship-loads of tutorials available for the program. I watched certain ones mostly because they were first in the list for the titles I was interested in. However, the sheer number of choices can be a real pain. For example, if you decide to edit the DNG files you created from the iPad, you'll find a ton of ways to do that. I chose to work on my files in Photoshop CS6. If the new version is purchased, it may be worth checking out the tutorials for that. BELOW: Foregrounds can quickly be created (by randomizing strokes & refactoring) for those situations where you need a solid form for your photo to rest on, such as the rows in this winter farm scene. I think the biggest limitation of the program isn't as much the features as it is the workflow. This is the most Apple-centric program I've ever seen. There are very few places to drop images into Photoshop and none of the image based features from the timeline are new. There are a number of shared items that you can use in the Fireworks (Adobe's vector graphic app), but you can't directly work with images in other apps. Perhaps by integrating the OS into the app, they could build a better flow. If something (or someone) inserts a photo into the app, there is little way to get rid of it without deleting and recreating it in Fireworks or other apps first, not that I'm really complaining. Involving someone with the capabilities is one of the program's biggest weaknesses. It definitely suffers when you have remote collaborators. While the Share for Review button allows you to send images and videos (and comments) to others, the ability to share to a RAW converter is virtually non-existent. Instead, you need to download and install the image, convert it, and then upload it. That's a very time-consuming and laborious process.

The web-based version of Photoshop is a beta at this moment. It is expected to continue to evolve and become more stable as it matures, but at this point in time, the web-based version of Photoshop is still significantly behind the desktop version in many ways.
While using the web-based version of Photoshop, you may be required to "claim an image" 1 as the web application does not have the same permissions to access your local files like you get in desktop Photoshop. A Photoshop image is an image saved in the Photoshop format that contains a PSD file. It can be any kind of image, from a full-resolution JPG, to a high-resolution TIF, to a low-resolution JPG, to even a RAW file. The desktop version of Photoshop can also open Photoshop files as well as other formats such as.psd files and as a result the web-based version of Photoshop can open these formats as well. However, you still need to claim these images as it gives the web-based version of Photoshop permissions to these files. However, claims files in your library have been removed. You'll need to add them back yourself. Considering the fact that the web-based version of Photoshop only has 90 days of access unless you login to your account, you cannot change this.See the following video for more information about the beta web-based version of Photoshop and to see what is coming. You also have the option of using Adobe Photoshop CC, which is a cloud-based version of the program. If you are going to be using the program for a long time, such as for a career, it does make sense to get the cloud-based version. e3d0a04c9c
