In this study, an anti-inflammatory polymeric scaffold was designed and made from a blend of styrene-ethylene-butylene-styrene (SEBS) and poly(2-valeroyl-ethylene-1,4-diamine [PTVEDA]) in a single-step solvent evaporation process. The PTVEDA segment of the copolymer was grafted on the SEBS backbone via isothermal direct copolymerization, via a PTVEDA-ss-P copolymer having antiphlogistic properties. Two copolymers with different grafting ratios were prepared: PTVEDA grafting ratio of 6.5 mol % (S6.5) and 10 mol % (S10). The morphology of the copolymer scaffolds was characterized using scanning electron microscopy (SEM). The hydrophilicity of the prepared scaffolds was characterized using contact angle measurements. The cytotoxic effect of the scaffolds on human dermal fibroblasts (HDF) was evaluated in the cell viability assay using the Presto Blue™ kit. The anti-inflammatory properties of the scaffolds were examined in RAW 264.7 macrophages treated with LPS. The macrophage cells were cultured onto scaffolds for 24 h to assess the migration of the macrophages into the scaffolds. The PTVEDA grafting ratio of S10 had higher cell viability than S6.5 scaffold, whereas scaffolds with lower PTVEDA grafting ratios had higher interconnecting pores (100-200 μm). Both scaffolds demonstrated cytotoxic effects, but S10 scaffold had a higher cell viability at a lower concentration than S6.5 scaffold. It was observed that both scaffolds promoted the migration of LPS-treated macrophages into the scaffold, whereas the number of migrated macrophages in the S10 scaffold was higher than in the S6.5 scaffold. The results showed that the PTV
